A leap forward in safety regulations

A view from the top. The new regulations recognise the importance the adventure industry has for both our economy and our national identity. Ensuring this industry is safe will help visitors continue to use them and, in doing so, provide sustainable, long-term viability for these services.

The balancing act. Creating 'acceptable' levels of risk can be challenging. Too little and you lose customers. Too much and your operation will be closed. With a sound auditing procedure perceived risk and actual risk can be correctly assessed and consistently managed.

Confidence in coordination. Providing sound criteria and a robust management system delivers a clear understanding of responsibilities at every level of your business. With this coordinated approach you have the confidence to continuously provide high-stakes, low-risk thrills to customers.

Who is it for?

The regulations cover operations that are designed deliberately to expose participants to a risk of serious harm that must be managed by the provider. However there is a range of different activities that do not fall under this administration. We suggest getting in touch with Worksafe New Zealand in the first instance to see whether your business is required to operate under the regulations. Activity providers currently required to register include, but are not limited to:

- Caving, canyoning and river boarding
- Bridge swinging and bungee jumping
- Mountaineering, abseiling and rock climbing
- Scuba diving
- Quad biking and off-road vehicle driving
- Kayaking
- High ropes courses
